proke up, and she lifted stormy eyes. Why do you keep repeating that?" she demanded. "In all candor I've ex-plained the situation. By going to college Anna and I can both shortly beome teachers and self-supporting. Here there is nothing for either."

"Am I nothing? You promised to marry me, Zane, and Anna can live with us. That was arranged long ago. You have no right to break the compact unless you mean to-break-with The girl got up quickly from her seat on the rock. Her eyes went to the little town below them, nestling close to a tree-fringed river, beyond which towered, black and uneven, the dividing line between the known and the inknown, the undesirable and the desirable, Moldy's Raise. Then it returned and rested on her companion' face. "John Vainey!" she cried, "I'd rather die than to live my life out there, married to your uncle's factotum there, married to your uncle's factotum and three of us trying to live on what is barely necessary for one. Why, it is unthinkable."

There was a surprised silence, then: "You forget that I am my uncle's heir." "But I am not of the stuff that waits for dead men's money." she retorted, scornfully. "Money honestly earned, the reward of my own efforts, for me. As your wife now I should live a life of poverty and probably die without having been beyond Moldy's Raise. We must wait." The delectables are not all beyon

The delectables are not all beyond Moldy's Raise." he said, sullenly. "I was city bred, yet I was glad to accept uncle's offer. Too, I am content—" "Content. That's just the trouble. You are easily satisfied. I know that and knowing it is how I see the future so plainly. My father was like you. His life was one long day of contentment. But what of mother, who was like me? She loved the things which were beyond her reach, just as I do. She missed all that was worth while in life, yet she was not altogether unhappy." "Not all," he said stubbornly. "She had a good man's devotion. That ought to count for something." "And so should I, John. And so it does count for something—a great deal," she cried out. "Don't misunderstand me. A man has the right to his own life, but he has not the right to saddle it on the shoulders of a woman who is willing to bear it because of her love for him. Father left behind nothing, yet we had never known the meaning of the word "luxury." When your uncle's estate comes to you it will be what he himself had earned. Not a dollar of it will be from your efforts. You are just waiting. I know your type, too."

John Valney slowly opened a clinched hand. Deep in the peak law. I little to you it will be what he himself had earned. Not a dollar of it will be from your efforts. You are just waiting. I know your type, too."

John Valney slowly opened a clinched hand. Deep in the palm lay a little circlet of twisted gold. Zane had laid it there at the beginning of their conversation an hour back. "Keep it for me, John." she pleaded, "a little while until I have tried my wings. I do so want to see something of life and know what I can do. Just one peep over Moldy's Raise, John, and then I'll come back."

He stood up and lifted it between his thumb and finger tips. "Evidently," he said, "there is no further use for this." Then he flung it from him, out among the flowers and rocks, and faced her. "And as for your astounding clarity of vision, Zane." he smiled coolly, "you are to be congratulated. Good-bye."

Then he strode off toward town, angrier than he had known he could be, too angry to feel either hurt or disappointment. Afterward he thought he had heard Zane's voice in a little cry, but he did not turn back, nor did he see her again. Her portrayal of him he believed to he without the semblance of truth—an insult as an excuse for breaking their engagement.

She could have obtained her freedom in a less disagreeable way, he told himself, trately, leaving him at least' a tender memory of her. That she had not, showed hard-heartedness and cruelty. Strange, he never before noticed such traits. "None are so blind as they who will not see." he quoted bitterly, for Zane had been to him the only one perfect girl. But time should decide which was right, and when that time came—His thoughts ended abruptly, and he looked at his uncle queerly. "Uncle," he asked, "what did the business pay the year before I came?"

His uncle looked up from the ledger he was poring over and reached for a small book. John knew the book perfectly. He also knew that a glance at a certain page would reveal, to the last cent, the life history of the firm for that year.

"And the year since I came?"

a certain page would reveal, to the last cent. the life history of the firm for that year.

"And the year since I came?"

"Thinking of a raise?" his uncle laughed. "No use, John. The business won't warrant it." Then very seriously he went on: "The fact is, John, we're losting out. I've been wanting to talk things over with you, but I've just put it off. I'm not young any more and I'm afraid.— It's an awful thing, John, to see the business you've given your life to build just dying by inches."

John listened, feeling his firm foundation slipping from under him. He seemed to be hearing Zane's arraignment, and when it was finished he sat for a long time in silence. Finally he went over to his uncle. "Let's think it over." he said. After that it seemed always a case of "thinking it over." He and his uncle were constantly together, and when the small book showed an improved report at the end of the year his satisfaction was unbounded. It was first proof that Zane had maligned him.

But his first great triumph came simultaneously with the news that Zane and Anna had finished their college course and had at once obtained good positions as teachers. Zane's contention that once leyond Mold's Raise they could soon be independent was true already. But her Aortrait of him—he laughed gayly in thinking of it. For large additional floor space had long ago been required to accommodate their increasing business, and it was just decided that they could reach out in a number of branch houses.

Then the years went, and his joy in Showing" Zane waned. Finally it was seldom remembered, just as his business, unguessed by himself, ceased to be from motive. His duties and responsibilities increased hourly. There was neither time are removed that the end of an unusually hard by something happened that disturbed nor inclination for self-analysis or retrospection.

But at the end of an unusually hard y something happened that disturbed his satisfaction. He had come in very 'red, and seeing his uncle, who was alling, asleep, he passed quietly to his own
'nom, thinking to rest a moment before dressing for dinner. He threw himself on the couch, to almost instantly fall asleep. Presently voices awakened him.
"A fine fellow, doctor!" his uncle was saying, enthusiastically: "honest, energetic, good judgment. It's a comfort to whow that my property will fall to cabable hands."

"Yes," the doctor agreed, heartily:
"But, what came over him? That first were both right and both wrong, John," she said, "but it was my going over him? That first she said, "but it was my going over him? That first she said, "but it was my going over a nimy-perfectly content with mere existence."

"Exactly" his uncle lauched "Put I" (THE END.) a nimby—perfectly content with mere existence."
"Exactly," his uncle laughed. "But I've never even questioned. One day he began questioning me about the business, and from that minute to this—"

John Valny got up from the sofa with the blood pounding in his temples and with a dizzy uncertainness of things. He took his hat and went out. The boy he had evidently been that first year, happy with Zane, elated over his prospects of wealth, contented with waiting, he saw for the first time, and with noonday Expressed in English money this would be £72 sterling. Then the tenant who occupies the house is compelled to pay the tax, which in an average community would be 7 shillings in the pound. That would mean that he would pay about $126 in tax, in addition to the $400 rent that he pays. clearness. Why, 'Zane had been right. Girl though she was, she had seen what he had not even suspected. Probably—"John! John Valney!" a voice called, and almost instantly a hand touched his arm. "Monster! I have chased you a block." Then, seriously, "You were right, John. The delectables are not all beyond Moldy's Raise. I just had to come back, and I must tell you how happy I am that you've proved my reading of you wrong. Oh." she exclaimed, as a train whistled, "I shall have to run." "Never mind about the train," he said, holding her back. "I'm just now trying to work it out. You were partly right, at least. I was contented, and for years my energy was bent to proving you wrong. Afterward, though, the business fascinated me, I worked for love of it. I'm not the man I was then, Zane, but perhaps you'll like me better. You know you said you would come back when you had tried your wings. Will you?" She fumbled in her purse for a mo-not pay his $126 taxes to one collector. He is valued by one authority for the poor rate—that is, for the support of paupers—and by quite a different authority for county and school purposes. In some places he may be rated by as many as five different rating authorities, and each of them may fix a different annual value on the property he occupies. Even when he has paid all these "rates," as they are called, he has other taxes to pay. He must pay an inhabited house tax, which ranges from 3 pence to 9 pence in the pound on ratable value. Over and above this he must deduct from the rent he pays the owner the amount of income tax which the owner must pay and return it to the government.

Now if the house burns down or is torn down and the land is not used no taxes are paid by anybody whomsoever. Absolutely unimproved land pays no rates, no income tax and no inhabited house duty. If undeveloped land is found to have an annual value of $250 an acre for other purposes than agriculture the owner must pay a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent of the annual value. But this startling innovation dates only from the disputed Lloyd George budget of 1909. Agricultural land such as deer parks and pheasants' preserves are untaxed. pheasants' preserves are untaxed.

sirable readjustment of the fiscal system.

It was an event of very great importance when Mr. Lloyd George included in the budget introduced a few weeks ago a proposition for the valuation of lands for the purpose of assessing local rates, thus committing the liberal government to the proposition of change from the annual value to the capital value of land for the purpose of taxation. It is by no means certain that this portion of the budget will be adopted, and even if it is adopted it cannot be put into general efadopted it cannot be put into general effect without supplemental legislation that may require several years to enact. All tax rates such as we express in decimal form, under the English system must be expressed as so many shillings and pence in the pound, so that flat amounts such as 4 per cent and 6 per cent cannot ordinarily be expressed.
